Read the passage and look at the pictures below.   Then answer the following question.

> Google Glass is a wearable computer device, not yet available to the public, that connects to a user's cellphone and has much of the same functionality, like text messaging and phone calls.   It can also take photos or record video hands-free, while applications from news organizations, social networking sites, Google Maps, etc. send information and updates to a screen above the user's right eye.
>
> Larry Page, Google's chief executive, said Glass is still in the early test phase.   "We are thinking very carefully about how we design Glass," he said, "because new technology always raises new issues."
