Read the passage below and answer the following question.

Faced with high stress levels among adolescents and a mental health crisis that includes worsening suicide rates, some states in the US are now allowing students to declare a mental health day.

In the last two years alone, many states have passed bills permitting children to be absent from school for mental or behavioral health reasons.

Late last year, the advocacy group Mental Health America surveyed teenagers about the top three things that would be most helpful for their mental health. More than half of the respondents cited the ability to take a mental health break or absence from either school or work. And in a poll of more than 1,500 teenagers conducted in May of last year, 78 percent of those surveyed said schools should support mental health days to allow students to prioritize their health.

Dr. Harold S. Koplewicz, medical director of the Child Mind Institute and a child and adolescent psychiatrist based in New York City, views mental health days as a joyous occasion: an opportunity to have fun.

Ideally, you can use mental health days as a way to celebrate your child's efforts in school, he said. But don't use mental health days to help your child avoid situations at school that are making them uncomfortable, he cautioned.
