Read the passage below and write an essay answering the following question.

Mexico is leading the way in using taxation to tackle obesity and related health issues, successfully taxing unhealthy food options. Research from Imperial College Business School affirms that taxing foods high in fat, salt, or sugar (HFSS) reduces sales, purchases, and consumption—particularly among lower-income groups, who tend to be the highest consumers of these items.

The study highlights that higher tax rates are more effective in lowering HFSS food consumption and reducing obesity, especially when paired with government assistance to pay for healthier alternatives and influence efforts of media and non-governmental organizations aligned to this goal. Evidence suggests that an 8% tax on high-calorie foods in Mexico led to an 18% drop in supermarket sales and up to a 40% decline in other retail environments. Additionally, countries that adopt higher tax rates—between 20% and 50%—and reinvest this money into healthy food government assistance programs see the most significant public health benefits.

This strategy demonstrates global potential, as similar policies have been explored in the United States, Canada, Hungary, Denmark, Singapore, and New Zealand. Governments seeking to address obesity and diet-related diseases may find these targeted fiscal measures an effective way to reshape consumer habits and promote healthier populations.
